

Boxwoods

Your canvas drop cloth pressed like guest linens even for yard work, pungent green bits collecting at your knees as you worked the hedge flanks with the gray rechargeable clippers.

Grandpa used the red ones to fill his canvas, too, before hauling the push mower to the creek to manicure the sparser, shaded grass should guests come.

Clippers buzz and rattle, recharged and recharging in memory only—your head white, his golden always bowed in summer devotion.

Mind the ivy in the breezeway, you would say. And the leatherleaf viburnum.

At forty, I cross-cut my lawn, one diagonal for each of you, and I recall the volunteer pear tree lost in the vinca.

To think you were just fifty, sixty, so many years before this year when I'd like so much to kneel beside you again but settle for planting boxwoods of my own.

—Andrew Maxfield

This poem was a finalist in the 2022 BYU Studies Poetry Contest.